Note If you're interested in the various programs, you can get the suite on a perpetual basis. With a subscription, you're billed every month at the same price. Typically, you pay between $60 and $80 a month. * Upgrade: Photoshop has a version called Photoshop CS6, which has a retail price of about $700. However, you can purchase a Photoshop CS6 upgrade from the Adobe website for about $150. The version number doesn't change if you buy the upgrade. Adobe tends to release an upgrade approximately every one to two years, so you can anticipate another upgrade in the next few years. ## Mastering Photoshop Elements Photoshop Elements ($300) is a stripped-down version of Photoshop designed for home use. As a result, the program has fewer features, but you don't get any of the advanced Photoshop features that you need to create sophisticated files. However, you get many features that enable you to do a lot of editing that lets you produce almost as good results as with Photoshop. So it may be worth your time to check it out. Elements is a great tool for those who don't want to invest much time and money in Photoshop. In fact, it's worth looking at just for the web design features. However, it does have some limitations. Here's what you can do with Elements: * Create _raster_ (_bitmap_) images. You can create raster images, which are just standard bitmap images, or you can create EPS (Encapsulated PostScript) and PDF files. (You can also print directly from Elements.) Elements also offers support for vector graphics, although the tools aren't as easy to use as in Adobe Illustrator or InDesign. * Create layered and arranged elements like you can in the older versions of Photoshop. * Create and save graphic elements such as buttons, shapes, and so on, and then reuse them in other projects. Elements enables you to organize these elements so you can use them

FBI operations to scan four months of retinal scans of every airline passenger raised privacy concerns Friday, as new threats continue to emerge in the realm of artificial intelligence. The U.S. Transportation Security Administration confirmed that it had distributed a letter to the flying public advising it of the program, dubbed "Precision Recognition." "While the privacy of airline passengers is our top priority, we are aware of some very real threats and are using this information, in addition to established security measures, to enhance passenger safety. There is no substitute for human judgment in the assessment of security threats, and this process is not an effort to become 'Big Brother' in our screening," TSA said in a statement. "Rather, it is an effort to identify any terrorist or other nefarious threat that might go undetected by the current screening process." The program, which is being tested with Southwest Airlines, does not include a facial recognition system, TSA said. Rather, the agency said, passengers' retinal scans are matched against a database of up to one million images to look for signs of "possible terrorist activity, such as laser pointers, explosives and other potentially deadly devices concealed on a passenger." The program is being tested at 30 U.S. airports, in addition to international departure locations in London and Paris, and is being expanded to include all U.S. airlines in the coming months, TSA said. The American Civil Liberties Union criticized TSA's plan in a statement. "Facial recognition is one of the most invasive and unreliable methods for identifying people, and it is far from the only way these government programs infringe upon our privacy," said Caroline Fredrickson, ACLU senior legislative counsel. "We are particularly concerned about the use of retinal scanning, which has been shown to be especially inaccurate, and cause serious health problems for people with vision impairments." In a separate episode in the world of security, Air Transat said it was told by the U.S. Department of Homeland Security that it was in violation of United States aviation regulations by naming a female passenger on a list of passengers who should be subjected to enhanced security procedures. U.S. Customs and Border Protection agents are conducting a full search of a United flight bound for Paris on Monday, and two United passengers remain on board the plane. It all stems from an incident last Thursday in which a female Air Transat flight attendant was subjected to invasive secondary screening that required her to go through a pat
