Aluminum fiber/foam/polyester matrix composites are very suitable for use in aerospace applications because of the high specific strength and stiffness. The glass fiber reinforced polyester are relatively stiff, since the glass fiber is very straight and oriented in the resin. However, the polyester matrix is not as stiff as the matrix in the aluminum/aluminum composites. Consequently, to maximize the specific stiffness of the composites, aluminum is added to the matrix to stiffen it, thereby increasing its tensile strength and modulus of elasticity. However, aluminum has a lower melting point than polyester and, as a result, melts during the fabrication of the composites. This limits the processing speed of the composite molding process. U.S. Pat. No. 6,319,084, which is incorporated herein by reference, discloses a method for making aluminum-clad composites. A molten aluminum layer is applied to the outer surface of a molten polyester layer. The layers are heated and inflated to form a composite layer. The surface of the composite layer can be tooled. However, the above-mentioned composites have the following shortcomings: (1) the infusion process involves a series of heating and cooling processes and requires a relatively long period of time; (2) the aluminum cladding process, which is often the most time consuming part of the production process, is usually carried out manually; and (3) residual aluminum oxides are likely to remain on the surface of the composite due to the frequent tooling.Cellular pharmacology and antitumor activities of baclofen in human cancers.
