create joy? What is it about us that makes us get together and talk about the things that are bothering us? It can be anything from an accident, to a disease, to a divorce, to a death in the family, to financial problems, to a lay off, to the loss of a loved one, to a hang-over from last night's drinking. It could be about our children's grades, about being the last one to arrive at the reunion, or about the restaurant you chose to go out to on the way home. It's about the fact that your mother insisted on sitting next to you at the reunion, that your aunt cried every single time she talked about her new beau or your father told you over and over that he was proud of your accomplishments. It's about the fact that you won first place in a chicken pot pie eating contest, and the fact that your boss is retiring after thirty years of service at the bank. It's about my favorite place in Maine, the place that I talk about with my friends as if it were a favorite character in the show "Cheers." It's about the time my best friend drove through a snowstorm to be with me to see the movie “Forrest Gump” and the time you had to be the family lifeguard for a day, but your friend did not show. It’s about the thing that you do at the reunion that nobody else does, but for which they all envy you. It’s about the fact that you invited a special guest to the reunion and she has the funniest sense of humor, and she will know the people who have won the contest to pick the best looking man in a “Playboy” magazine ad. It’s about your best friend, who just won the pie eating contest, but who left the bathroom a few minutes before it began. It’s about the family dinner that you cooked your Aunt’s way and her response that she is going to treat her friend like a guest in her own home. It’s about the fact that you have done so much for your parents, that they say that they can’t believe that they raised a daughter with your level of concern. It’s about the fact that you chose a college that is

When is a cookie not a cookie? When it's a health claim description. The Health Lab is the first product in the world to help you decipher what's really in the food or drink you're eating or drinking. We analyzed 1,000 packaged products across 22 categories and found that common claims are accurate, and some are misleading. We found that the majority of claims for salt, sugar, fat, fiber and a few nutrients are accurate.

Fiber Fiber is another word for plant-based dietary fiber. In fact, the Food and Drug Administration does not require that it be listed in the ingredients, though most products do. In the Health Lab, we found that the amount of fiber is typically lower than what is claimed and in some cases even lower than the truth. We found that one product even included vegetable juice extract fiber that was over 11 grams, which is 21 grams more than the fiber in a cup of broccoli!

Sugar Sugar content is difficult to read accurately because its listed as both total and digestible sugar. Digestible sugar is the sugar that is actually absorbed by the body and that has health benefits. While total sugar is listed as the amount that is actually present in the food or drink, digestible sugar is typically listed as the amount that is absorbed and used by the body and that has health benefits. We found that 71% of the sugar claims we checked were accurate. Of those that were inaccurate, some were misleading, while others didn't even include the amount of digestible sugar. If you're looking for the total amount of sugar, then the sugars on the nutrition label should provide the amount. Fat

Nearly 99% of the fat content claims on the label were accurate. There are, however, 3 other words that are commonly used to describe fat: saturated, trans, and unsaturated. Most common brands actually listed the amount of saturated fat present in the product, but may have listed trans fat as well. Trans fat

The majority of claims for trans fat were accurate. The primary finding in our audit was that the amount of trans fat that is contained in a product can often be 2 to 6 times the amount that is listed. However, if the trans fat is listed as zero, it might contain up to 2.5 times as much as indicated. The average amount of trans fat from these products was 3.7 times the amount that was listed.
